means that the action of God is not merely an inference which one may permissibly draw, but rather much more: that it is a hypothesis which we can test and scrutinize. This is a critical distinction because science is about what we can demonstrate, not what we may believe. Faith says "I believe ...

If God dies, Dostoevsky said, "everything will then be permitted." This is a very frightening idea. As you move forward through time and history from the 19 th century and contemplate National Socialism and the horrors of totalitarian communism, Dostoevsky looks positively prophetic. The same is true of Nietzsche. In the aftermath of God's death, he believed humanity, would become entranced ...
